There are tunnels connected to the Capitol Building! Legislators use them to avoid the press, among other things! Take note. (media.patriots.win)

Leftists always project, so when they accuse everyone else of incest well, let's just say that they're probably inbred.

19 Absolutely! There's an extensive underground network that connects DC and the surrounding areas, thanks to the Metro. I've always assumed for every part of a Metro station that I can see, there's a covert section that's accessible to the politicians.

4 ▼ Oh heavens no. I believe you misunderstood me. I wasn't saying that I think anyone should or would intentionally cause a service disruption that would prevent the remote hearing. I was just saying that it seems silly to take that chance on something so important.

Especially at a time when we know Chinese spies have compromised at least one member of the house (and on the intelligence committee, no less!) and all those other government systems were hacked.

And you know.. Antifa are almost certainly going to be there to "counter protest".. and given their history of throwing incendiary devices at federal buildings, it's not out of the realm of possibility that some important IT infrastructure gets disabled.

But I wouldn't know anything about any of that.

4 Tunnels and institutions are very real. The only one's I've seen with my own eyes are the massive tunnel networks under UCLA. You can go to all ends of that campus through underground utility tunnels (these are all well-lit standing-height tunnels). I explored them night after night back in the 1990's. 99.9% of people that live and work around Westwood have no idea they exist.
